

Social Network and Volunteer

It is a commonly known secret that for landing a job, what you know is less important than who you know. The easiest way to land a job is through a referral from someone who already knows you. Friends, neighbors, and relatives, school alumni, and ex-coworkers are all possible parts of your social network. Finding the time to be a volunteer worker for your local community or a nonprofit organization can also help extend your social network. As a student studying computer science, you should be able to very easily find an opportunity where you can volunteer your time using your computer programming skills.
